Hongkong, October 21st, 1878.

The correspondence relating to the Dietary Scale and Structure of Victoria Gaol which the Governor laid before the Legislative are dated in 1877 and their contents have been already made public through the medium of Hrs Exertrency's speeches on crime and prison discipline. The latest dispatch from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, dated 5th June of the present column. It is a document which requires grave consideration, pointing as it does to the possible repetition of the Stonecutter's said last Monday, that as regards gaol accommodation, "We must deal with the matter like men of business, and we have to face the requirements of the Colony and those of the Secretary of State," but prudence suggests that we should endeavour to keep the some places Dutch flags were hoisted. "The system of punishment ought to be of a strictly deterrent nature, so that Hongkong should be looked upon by the criminals of the adjacent mainland as a ing ground. It will be remembered that the Governor, when he spoke in the Council Chamber on the necessity of enlarging the gaol, said Mr. Paice had prepared plans according to which the present gool might be adapted to the separate system at a cost of $95,000. These plans are disapproved of by. The settled native population must, of course, in the natural order of things, develop a few criminals, but had we only Chineman observed some smoke issuing from a these to deal with our present gaol would be fur too large. The common sense plan o dealing with the criminals from the mainland would seem to be to keep them at a distance, and with this view the means already provided by law for keeping the Colony clear of them should be strictly put in force, that is, the free use of the cat and the deportation of old offenders. The rigorous prosecution doubtful characters as rogues and vagabonds would also have a good effect. With regard to the proposals of the Secre tary of State for the Colonies in relation to the enlargement or removal of the Gaol, we cannot agree with either. In the first place, the project to extend the Gaol up to Caine Road would involve an enormous expense, in the shape of compensation to the owners of the substantial houses existing on the site, also present. The godowns belong to Mesers. D. without at the same time giving the necessary space. If the present Gaol must be enlarged, the best plan will be to incorporate the Police Barracks and the Magistracy Compound. New barracks could be erected on | 31st August, and 30th September, 1878, are the site of the present Civil Hospital, and it published for general information:would probably not be difficult to secure a convenient site for the Police Court We fall, however, to see the necessity for any very extensive addition to the Gaol if deterrent measures be enforced against criminals, and would most carnestly deprecate any attempt to put the Colony to the serious outlay a new Gaol would entail. It may happen, perhaps, that-owing to the red tape of the Colonial Office-before any plan has been approved we shall be able to reduce the London, and China number of prisoners so materially that it will ""Had China... be found unnecessary to proceed with the scheme of enlargement. It would be hard, indeed, if the circumlecution and prograstination of the Colonial Office did not sometimes work to the benefit of this Colony. We have waited patiently for many years until London, and Chin some venerable fogey condescends to bestow his attention on the plans for the Praya Wall and China... we shall, mayhap, wait with still greater Corporation patience for many more years for the same ancient party to deliver himself on the plans and propositions for Victoria Gaol.

'A dinner was given last night to Prefescor Hackel. of Your by French savants. In his speech, as reported in the Temps, he expressed gratification at the progress of evolutionist ideas among French men of beiones, and remarked that professors and preachers who ridiculed man's descent from the apeninwittingly furnished the last proof of it, their pride and children wanity being feibles which might have been bequeathed by the ape. Man, however, did not descend from any Isnown anthropoid; but was a branch of the catarhine monkeys of the Old World: The continuity of nature was daily becoming more evident, and superatition, maticism, and teleology would give way to reason, e meality, and mechanism. A NEW CRATER IN THE MOON Dr. Klein, a German astronomer, has recently called the attention of astronomers to a lunar crater some three miles wide, which had not before been observed, and which, he feels sure, was not in existence two years ago. Astronomers have long since given up all hope of tracing either the signs of actual life upon the moon or traces of the past existence of living creatures there there are still among them those who beliave that by sedulous and careful scrutiny processes of insterial change may be recognised in that seemingly inert mass. In reality, perhaps, the wonder rather is that signs of change should not be often recognised, than that from time to time a new crater should appear or the walls of old craters fall in. The moon's surface is exposed to variations of temperature compared with which those affecting the surface of our earth are altogether trifling. It is true there is no summer or winter in the moon. Sir W. Herschel has spoken of the lunar seasons as though they resembled our own, but in reality they are very different. The sun's midday height at any lunar station is only about three degrees greater in summer than in witter: whereas our summer sun is 47 dogs higher in the sky at noon than our winter sun. In fact, a midsummer's day on the moon does not differ more from a midwinter's day, as far as the sun's actual path on the sky is concerned, than with us the 17th of March differs from the 25th, or the 19th of September from the 27th. It is the change from day to night which chiefly affects the moon's surface. In the lunar year of seasons, lasting 346 of our days, there are only 11^{2} lunar days, each lasting 294 of ours. Thus day lasts more than a fortnight, and is followed by a night of equal length. Nor is this all. There is neither air nor moisture to produce such effects as are produced by our air and the moisture it contains in mitigating the heat of day and the cold of night. -Under the sun's rays the moon's surface becomes hotter and hotter as the long lunar day pro by Arctic vovagers would be oppressively hot These are not merely theoretical conclusions, though even as such they could be thoroughly relied upon. The moon's hear has been measured by the present Lord Rosse (using his father's splendid six-feet mirror) He separated the heat which the moon simply reflects to us from that which her heated surface itself gives out (or, technically, he separted the reflected from the radiated heat). by using a glass screen which allowed the The Rev. On the American continent, for example, there are some peculiarities of geological formation which seem to correspond closely with some of the features of the lunar globe, presently to be noticed; and it seems to us improbable that geologists might find in the study of certain regions in North America the means of interpreting the difference of tint between higher and lower levels on the moon. If so, light would probably be thrown on very difficult questions relating to the remote past, not only of the moon, but of our own earth.
